

I will only use original Apple batteries as long as Apple supports the hardware since the quality of third party Lithium-ion batteries is extremely poor. If an original Apple battery is not an option, then OWC is the next best choice. Sometimes you can get a good OWC battery and other times you get bad ones.

an Apple replacement will let you retain battery health settings because batteries are unfortunately paired to the logic board and only Apple can pair new batteries. I wouldn't get a kit from Amazon if you want to go DIY and try to source an ampsentrix battery instead (great quality brand).

The appearance and packaging of genuine batteries are brand new and undamaged, while refurbished batteries will definitely show signs of having been used. Look at the thickness of the battery shell. The shell of a new battery is thicker, and you can feel the hardness of the shell by pressing hard. Most refurbished batteries have polished shells ...
